Before finding her Aeon home, Sahro and her daughters lived in Texas. In order to make ends meet, Sahro had to work nights, leaving her daughters in the care of neighbors who didn't speak her language. Without other Somali immigrants in her community, Sahro was isolated and struggled to adjust to her new surroundings.

Thanks to the advice of family friends in the Twin Cities, Sahro and her daughters moved to Minnesota. With the support of her community, Sahro was able to connect to resources in the area and find an Aeon home. She now lives among neighbors who come from her community and speak her language. Even when things are hard, her community is there to support her, offering resources and connections that she wouldn't have otherwise. Now, Sahro knows that help and support are just a knock on the door away.

For Sahro, living in an Aeon home has offered a sense of community and the power of connection. Her children have caretakers who speak their language, and Sahro has found a job that helps her make ends meet. She has even connected with neighbors who are not part of her Somali community that she can turn to for support- and help them in return. For Sahro, that has made all the difference.
